Personal Satisfaction or Money and Fame?

There are more than six billion human beings on this planet, and, mentally, every single one of them is unique. There is no way to know if all the people are motivated by personal satisfaction or money and fame, but one should believe that subconsciously, all men (mankind) are motivated by money and fame. This perspective leaves a certain “unknown” point. It also covers a “subconscious” point of each person’s underlying nature. One must recognize however, that there are exceptions to the rule.

Despite the best efforts of the scientific and military research community, no person, organization, government, or anybody, for that matter, has learned or discovered a way to “read” minds. Each of the six billion people on Earth has their own unique motivations. As such, there is no way to know what each and every one of these people act on, be it, satisfaction, fame, money, or any of a variety of other motivators. However, based on general consensus, certain subconscious motivators can be said to influence many.

In a short 200 years, the “American Dream” emerged as “be all you can be” and “shoot for the stars”. When the first immigrants came to America, the Pilgrims sought religious freedom. However, not even 100 years later, immigrants flowed in from Europe chasing dreams of a new life out of poverty with money to spare. Their actions were portrayed as if to benefit their family, but inside, due to the nature of human beings, they really wanted the benefit for themselves, and with more benefits, came more money.

Nevertheless, there are an abundance of exceptions throughout history.

In the world, there are people scattered across the globe who are truly selfless. Ghandi is a perfect example. He strove for peace in India, going out of his way to stick to his morals, no matter the cost. George Washington is another great example. Washington led the Continental Army against the British for the people of the colonies even though he was reluctant at first. Though people generally act on motivations of money and fame, we can be selflessly satisfied.

The world is a popular place. Nearly every human being resides on Earth, save for a few in space, and each one of them is a different being. There is no way to know what motivates each one, but generalizations can be made about their subconscious motivations. Every person's mind has an unknown depth, but subconsciously we are all the same. Despite this, chaos theory will say that there are exceptions to this, like every other rule.
